

When you study marketing in the US are you able to get a job in another country?

Sept. 2011

By Stacie Garlieb
President of Successful Impressions, LLC

There are several factors in using education in the US to secure positions in other countries. Here are some things to consider:

- Does the person have practical (internship or work) experience in marketing in the US?
- Is the company multinational and can the candidate start working for the organization in the US while completing their education?
- What language requirements are there in the other country, and does the candidate have those?
- What level of education is needed by the company to work internationally?
Some marketing positions in other countries require a Master level degree, so a candidate with a Bachelor degree would have to start in the US and secure that educational experience.